The MSC Poesia (Italian for “poetry”) recently dropped her anchor at the Cape Town Cruise Terminal for the first time. This was one of three stops for the ship on South African shores – Durban and Gqeberha being the remaining two. To commemorate this occasion, a maiden call ceremony was held with Captain Roberto Leotta, Ross Volk and James Vos in attendance.

The Pigalle Lounge is a large dining area, filled with deep red seats, and a stage at the centre. Here is where we sat as we watched Ross Volk, managing director of MSC Cruises, exchange commemorative gifts with the captain of the ship, Roberto Leotta.

Moments before, Volk spoke about the significance of the vessel's visit, stating that the milestone places the country on the map of world cruises. He also mentioned how important it was for the local economy. "With 60 nationalities on board, the cruise helps to expose the passengers to Cape Town and South Africa as a whole," he said. "It brings foreigners to the shores, and they spend money, boosting the economy, which is needed."

James Vos, Mayoral Committee Member for Economic Growth, was also in attendance. Vos emphasised his pride in MSC Cruises choosing Cape Town as a destination. Similar to Volk, Vos also mentioned the significance of this type of tourism for the city's economy, stating that it connects Cape Town with key source markets, therefore stimulating supply and demand for local businesses.
