The Hear Her Voice research takes an in-depth look at how women in SSA are and can leverage technological advancements to enhance their businesses. The research for Hear Her Voice SSA was conducted in multiple countries i.e. Kenya, Ghana, Namibia, Nigeria and South Africa – to further understand female entrepreneurship across the region. Although the paper doesn't highlight the Namibian and Nigerian markets, it is important to note that they were part of the study and key in assisting us with a robust understanding of female entrepreneurs in the region.

The research discovered that the overarching motivational driver for female entrepreneurs to start their own businesses is born out of necessity, not opportunity. In this paper the key findings are unpacked extensively around the lack of mentorship, shortage of personal and business skills, and deficit of networking and business expansion opportunities amongst female entrepreneurs across SSA being the core focus areas.

More than 90% of the female entrepreneurs involved in the research said starting a business as a female is extremely difficult, they would have benefitted from having a support structure throughout their journey, both from a personal and professional perspective as this would have equipped them to build a successful and sustainable business. One of the core pillars of the Female Foundry initiative is to provide entrepreneurs with access to mentors that will assist them in developing their businesses. These respondents were sourced from a total base of 8,425 female subscribers from key Sub-Saharan African emerging markets: Kenya (1,023), Ghana (789) and South Africa (1,091). The Namibian respondents were not included in the above figures as their feedback was taken from social platforms.
